

SOCIO-POLITICAL FACTORS OF QADĀ' IN EIGHTH/FOURTEENTH CENTURY SYRIA*

I. INTRODUCTION

It is a commonplace that qadā' constitutes one of the institutional elements of Islamic law. Like iftā' and hisba it is bound to a variety of theoretical and practical preconditions in order to be operative. With regard to the application of law —and this is the essential function of qadā'— we may assume that a corpus iuris in any legal system is confronted with specific social and political conditions. We even may go further and propose an interdependence between law and society. In the same way as law, that is the totality of ideal norms, determines and influences human acts, so human beings in their turn tend to determine law by interpreting it or by creating new rulings. It is just this dialectical process, which preserves a legal system from growing out of touch with the demands of society. In Islamic law the institution of qadā' holds an important key position between theory and practice and is, from the theoretical point of view, essential for keeping the above mentioned process in motion. In which way however, did the functioning of qadā' actually take place in the history of Islamic law?

Attention in this study is not so much directed to the content of judicial decisions, but to the social and political preconditions for the exercise of qadā'. If qadā' is an integral part of the society, then there must be an administrative and educational infrastructure as well as a climate of tolerance and respect for judicial pronouncements. From this point of view the exercise of qadā' basically depends on three essential factors:

1. Existence of a judicial staff responsible for the Islamic parts of the population.
2. Qualification of the judges in the field of Islamic law.
3. Independence of the judges in a state system, which claims to be nomocratic.

* Paper presented at II Joseph Schacht Conference on Theory and Practice in Islamic Law, organised by the CSIC, Granada, Spain, 16-20th December, 1997.

In order to enter a field which has not yet been the object of researches the study is limited to qaḍā' in fourteenth century Syria. It is based on a variety of biographical works and chronicles, particularly the monumental work al-Wāfi bi'l-wafayāt of Khalil b. Aybak as-Şafadī (d. 764/1363), ad-Durar al-kāmina of Ibn Ḥajar al-'Asqalānī (d. 852/1448) and al-Bidāya wa'n-nihāya of Ibn Kathīr (d. 771/1369). As eyewitnesses, they supply authentic material about Syrian judges in the fourteenth century. Although of course not all the material is authentic and the biograms are structured in a somewhat stereotyped way, it is possible to get an idea of the qualities and activities of the judges.

II. EXISTENCE AND DISPERSION OF ISLAMIC JUDGES

In one of his works, al-Maqrīzī<sup>1</sup> points out that the application of Islamic law in the Mamluk empire has been restricted by another legal system, the Yāsa of the Mongols. According to his reports, the Mamluk ḥājib in the middle of the fourteenth century extended his competence to all fields of law. This, however, seems to stand in sharp contrast with what other sources of that time and region show. Apart from the fact that the reports of al-Maqrīzī in this respect may not be regarded as reliable,<sup>2</sup> eyewitnesses as as-Şafadī, Ibn Kathīr and as-Subkī mention a number of facts, which point to the existence of an Islamic administration of justice in Syria.<sup>3</sup> The most striking fact common to almost all contemporary sources is the high number of Islamic judges.

Out of the bulk of biographies in the afore mentioned prosopographical works and chronicles 236 judges could be identified exercising the office of qaḍā' once or several times in fourteenth century Syria. 79 of them were chief judges, particularly in Damascus and Aleppo, and 67 functioned as deputies. Certainly this is only the smaller part of all Islamic judges, because we know from the sources that there are further qādīs, who cannot however be completely identified. If we consider the number of Muslim inhabitants in the Syrian territories at that time—which may be estimated at about 500.000<sup>4</sup>—and the fact that many qādīs—particularly those in the smaller towns and villages—lasted in office a rather long time (14 years on average),<sup>5</sup> then this amounts to a proportion of at least 1:15000. Compared with the very high proportion of 1:1000 aimed at but not reached in present-day Germany this points at a tightly-knit judicial network. We have to take into account furthermore that a lot of conflicts, which at present time are solved by courts, in fourteenth century Syria could be settled out of court or fell within the competence of concurrent jurisdictional institutions like iftā' and hisba.

Another feature of the judicial network is the dispersion of judges. Although we observe a considerable concentration of judges in the large cities, Damascus<sup>6</sup> and Aleppo<sup>7</sup>, we also find qādīs in other places scattered all over Syria. Important towns like Tarābulus,<sup>8</sup> Ḥamāt,<sup>9</sup> Hims,<sup>10</sup> Ba'labakk<sup>11</sup> and al-Quds<sup>12</sup> were places of permanent judicial activity as well, but the number of Islamic judges in these towns fell significantly below those in Damascus and Aleppo. With regard to the large extension of the Syrian territories it is important to note that qādīs were appointed also to little towns and villages like Şafad, Khalīl, Nābulus, Ghazza, ‘Ajlūn, Shayraz, az-Zabadānī and al-Karak. Altogether are mentioned 30 cities, towns and villages<sup>13</sup> and there are further places not mentioned explicitly.

<sup>4</sup> It is a regrettable fact that there are no reliable statistics concerning the population of fourteenth century Syria. According to Ottoman statistics of the sixteenth century Damascus and Aleppo, the greatest cities in Syria, had about 60.000 inhabitants respectively (Lapidus, I., Muslim cities in the later Middle ages, Cambridge, 1967, 79). Supposing that the population of Damascus and Aleppo represented about one fifth of the whole Syrian population, the number of the Syrian inhabitants did not exceed 500.000 at that time. We also have to consider that the population increased and that there was a high rate of mortality because of the plague in the middle of the 14th century. On the other side the number of 236 qādīs certainly does not represent the whole number of qādīs as can be seen from many judges mentioned incidentally without being completely identifiable.

<sup>5</sup> The average length of tenure has been calculated on the basis of 86 qādīs about whom we have detailed informations concerning the tenure of office. In order to get the qādī/inhabitants proportion, the average number of 14 has been related to all 236 judges and to a period of 100 years. As mentioned above, we must consider, however, that there are further qādīs. So, for example, the chief judges and judges (altogether 169) normally have 2, sometimes even 3 deputies, but the sources only mention 67 explicitly. Furthermore it is important to know, that most of the judges exercised qaḍā' in several places, but it is mainly their judicial activities in Damascus and Aleppo that are described in detail in the sources and therefore have been considered in the abovementioned calculation. The average length of tenure in cities or towns other than Damascus or Aleppo amounts to 23 years and this number even increases if we consider the Ḥanafīs, Ḥanbalīs and Mālikīs only.

As to the law schools, the dispersion of qādīs is somewhat different. Whereas the Shāfi‘ī qādīs, who represent the vast majority of the judges (55%), came to appear in nearly all towns and villages, the Ḥanafīs, Mālikīs and Ḥanbalīs, representing 19%, 13% and 13% respectively, were raised to the bench only in a few towns mentioned above. Ḥanafī judges are found in 6 towns, Mālikī and Ḥanbalī judges in 5 and 3 towns respectively. There was, however, a tendency to reduce the influence of the Shāfi‘īs in favor of the other madhhabs. This tendency to establish parity between the law schools, reflected in the constitutional jurisprudence of al-Qarāfī,<sup>14</sup> already became perceptible in thirteenth century Egypt. After the establishment of four chief judges in Cairo in 663/1264 and some years later in Damascus, the monopoly of the Shāfi‘īs and to a certain degree of the Ḥanafīs was removed also in Aleppo,<sup>15</sup> Tarābulus,<sup>16</sup> Ḥamāt<sup>17</sup> and Ḥims.<sup>18</sup> In 748/1347 Sharaf ad-Dīn al-Maqdisī became the first Ḥanbalī judge in Halab. The first Mālikī judge in that town, appointed before 767/1366, was Aḥmad b. Yāsīn b. Muḥammad ar-Rubāḥī. The Shāfi‘ī judgeship in Şafad was coupled with a Ḥanafī and a Mālikī one according to some chronicles,<sup>19</sup> but this is not confirmed by the biographical material.

III. QUALIFICATION

The more or less detailed descriptions in furu' and ādāb al-qāḍī literature<sup>20</sup> concerning the preconditions of qadā' seem to postulate a high level of qualification. The emphasis, in the first place, is made on ijtihād as a high category of qualification, meaning that the qāḍīs have to be skilled in subjects such as Qur'ān, ḥadīth, fiqh, uṣūl, khilāf, 'arabiyya, nahw, etc. A realistic point of view, however, moved the jurists to keep the door open for all those aspirants of qadā' who failed the hurdle of ijtihād. In fourteenth century Syria it was a generally accepted opinion<sup>21</sup> that only a small number of scholars really deserves the denomination mujtahid and that therefore non-mujtahids too must be allowed to apply Islamic law. Several subcategories of ijtihād have been developed since the 10 th. century and thence formed the theoretical basis for the actual standard of qualification.

In fact, there existed only a few scholars in fourteenth century Syria who were regarded by their contemporaries as mujtahid. No doubt Ibn Taymiyya, one of the most outstanding figures in that time, belonged to the small circle of mujtahids, but he never assumed the office of qadā'. Among the qāḍīs we only find one scholar reaching the level of ijtihād: the renowned chief judge of Damascus Taqī'd-Dīn as-Subkī.<sup>22</sup> He remained in office for 17 years and represented the Shāfi'i madhab in Syria up to his death in 756/1355. All the other 235 judges, however, were deemed more or less qualified jurists but not mujtahids in the narrow sense of the notion.

This being a matter of fact, it nevertheless appeared to be sufficient for the functioning of the judicial order. More than 90% of the qāḍīs, whose biograms contain details about their qualification were proficient fiqh experts and familiar with the bulk of prescriptions in the furu' works. It becomes clear that the focal point of the qāḍī's education lies in the field of fiqh followed by ḥadīth (30%), uṣūl al-fiqh (18%) and 'arabiyya (15%). Other subjects as nahw, tafsīr, qirā'a, bayān, farā'id, ta'rīkh, adab, kalām, mantiq and hisāb play a marginal role.

This tendency is not only confirmed by the existence of more than 100 law colleges alone in Damascus —an-Nu‘aymī<sup>23</sup> gives a full list of them—but also by the categories and number of the teachers, who formed the intellectual basis of the qādīs. The largest group consists of fuqahā', some of them prominent, like Tāj ad-Dīn b. al-Firkāh,<sup>24</sup> his son Burhān ad-Dīn, an-Nawawī,<sup>25</sup> Ibn ‘Abd as-Salām,<sup>26</sup> Ibn al-Wakīl,<sup>27</sup> Zayn ad-Dīn al-Fāriqī,<sup>28</sup> Ibn al-‘Attār<sup>29</sup> and numerous teachers who were themselves qādīs.<sup>30</sup>

The second group concerning ḥadīth teachers underlines the impression that ḥadīth much more than Qur’ān represents an integral part of the qādī's education. According to the biographical data, Aḥmad b. ‘Abd al-Dā’im,<sup>31</sup> Ibn Abī'l-Yusr<sup>32</sup> and al-Hajjār<sup>33</sup> are supposed to be ḥadīth lecturers for not less than 38 judges.<sup>34</sup> The third and fourth place is held by the uṣūlīs<sup>35</sup> and naḥwīs<sup>36</sup> respectively. At least 50% of the qādīs, in their turn, assumed teaching posts in one or several law colleges in Syria and in some cases the appointment as qādī was directly connected with the appointment as teacher. We may assume that the accumulation of offices largely contributed to keeping a close connection between theory and practice.

The afore mentioned criteria are suitable, to a certain degree, to indicate the general juristic education of the judges. Biographical reports, however, concerning the works composed, read or memorized by the qādīs give an idea of the concrete legal material with which the judges seemed to be well acquainted. Compared with the impressive multitude of legal literature produced up to that time, it seems to be a rather small selection of furū' and uṣūl works, that the judges of fourteenth century Syria usually heard or memorized. Certainly there were a few proficient experts who mastered the whole of uṣūl and furū', studied many works and even composed commentaries or other legal works, but that is not the rule with regard to the judges. The general repository of positive law appeared to be, in the Shāfi‘ī madhab, small manuals like the Tanbih<sup>37</sup> of ash-Shirāzī, the Minhāj al-tālibin of an-Nawawī and the Hāwī of al-Qazwīnī. Other furū' works are mentioned here and there, but they did not rank among the standard works. Interestingly, in the field of uṣūl al-fiqh the Shāfi‘īs tended to exceed the madhab boundaries reclining in the first place upon the Mukhtaṣar of the Mālikī Ibn al-Hājib, an uṣūl work which obviously was deemed authoritative in that time by all law schools except the Ḥanafīs. Only in the second place they made recourse to the Minhāj of the Shāfi‘ī al-Bayḍāwī (d. 692/1293). The Ḥanafīs and Mālikīs usually read, heard or memorized the Hidāya of al-Marghinānī and the Muwaṭṭa' of Mālik b. Anas respectively. Most of the Ḥanbalī judges were well acquainted with Ḥanbalī works as the Muqni' of Ibn Qudāma or the Muḥarrar of Majd ad-Dīn b. Taymiyya, but they sometimes tended to study or comment works of other law schools as well. The vast furū' spectrum of Ḥanbalī fiqh works resulting from a considerable openness to other law schools blurred the madhab boundaries anyway.

Ahmad b. Ya‘qūb Jamāl ad-Dīn b. aṣ-Ṣābūnī, d. 1331 (Ibn Ḥajar, Durar, 1/357-8/837; Ṣafadī, Wāfi, 8/276/3701); the above-mentioned judges Ibn az-Zamlakānī, Jalāl ad-Dīn al-Qazwīnī, Tāj ad-Dīn as-Subkī, Ibn Khaṭīb Jibrīn and Shams ad-Dīn al-Isfahānī are also mentioned as uṣūl teachers.

<sup>36</sup> The most prominent teacher in ‘arabiyya/naḥw is Muḥammad b. Yūsuf b. ‘Alī Abū Ḥayyān, d. 1344 (Ibn Ḥajar, Durar, 5/70-6/4693; Kutubī, Fawāt, 2/282, 352-6).

<sup>37</sup> That at-Tanbih was commonly used at this time in Syria and Egypt appears not only from the qādī biograms (12x) but also from many other biograms (Ibn Ḥajar, Durar, vol. 1, n.º 1232, 1259, vol. 2, n.º 1611, 1666, 1710, 1924, 2144, vol. 3, n.º 2637, 2864, 2902, 3109, 3263, 3438, vol. 4, n.º 3689, 3778, 3833, 3878, 3892, 4177, 4437, 4458, vol. 5, n.º 4889, 4919, 5170).

To analyze in which way judicial decisions can be deduced from the basic legal material, is not the subject of this paper. It can be pointed out, however, that at least one third of the Syrian qādīs —and probably much more— was familiar with one or several fiqh and/or uṣūl works and that this legal material, in one way or another, formed the basis for judicial decisions.

IV. INDEPENDENCE OF QAḌĀ'

The political and economical independence of the qādīs certainly represents one of the essential preconditions of qaḍā'. In order to carry out their office independently, the judges, in the first place, had to be free of interferences of political rulers who usually tended to influence the judicial decisions in one way or another. Indeed, there is abundant material in the biographical works indicating this conflict between the qādīs as part of the 'ulamā' class on one side and the Mamluk rulers on the other. According to some opinions in Western literature<sup>38</sup> the qādīs appeared to be the losers in this conflict, being totally exposed to the intrigues of the Mamluks.

Admittedly, now and then disobedient qādīs have been made compliant by the political rulers, but in the long run, it appears to have been the other way round. Qādīs as well as other 'ulamā' were heavily involved in economical and political affairs attacking illegal taxes<sup>39</sup> or preventing attempts to confiscate endowment properties. Exposed to a considerable pressure the political rulers in several cases made concessions and issued decrees supporting the interests of the 'ulamā'.<sup>40</sup>

The most important instrument of controlling the qādī's activities was the traditional right of the sultans to appoint and dismiss the judges. The biographical sources make clear, however, that the actual use of that instrument in fourteenth century Syria may not be overemphasized. In fact, the political impact on qaḍā' by way of appointment or dismissal was rather limited. The following points possibly confirm this opinion:

1. Nearly all qādīs were recruited from the lawyer class. Only one member of the ruler class, Amīr Ghālib, actually became judge. But he proved to be unable to carry out his office.<sup>41</sup> We may conclude from this fact that the judges, as a rule, had to be members of the fuqahā' class (tā'ifat al-fuqahā'). This not only confirms the qualification of the judges, but also suggests that the political rulers to a certain extent were prevented from arbitrary appointments. The formulation «somebody introduced someone into the fuqahā' class», frequently used in the sources,<sup>42</sup> makes clear that there were distinct boundaries between different groups in the Mamluk society and that the fuqahā' formed one of them. As has already been noted, the fuqahā' were connected with each other by a variety of educational as well as family ties forming a coherent unity. This is not to say that the lawyers constituted a homogeneous bloc of shari'a experts unanimously conspiring against the political rulers. In fact, the fuqahā' class was divided into subgroups represented by the four law schools, which sometimes violently competed with each other. So in a letter of Najm ad-Dīn at-Tarsūsī directed to the Sultan it is reported<sup>43</sup> that the Ḥanafī chief judge in Damascus was striving for a monopoly of the Ḥanafīs in the Mamluk Empire at the expense of the other law schools. The general contentiousness among the lawyers can be observed in a lot of disputes recorded in the chronicles. But in spite of these rivalries occurring also within the law schools the boundaries between the ahl ad-dawla and the fuqahā' proved to be strong enough to impede encroachments from the political side. The specific structure of the fuqahā' class very often enabled the lawyers to preselect the candidates, who afterwards were appointed by the sultans.

2. It is a fact to be traced back to the very beginning of Islām that the political rulers are entitled to appoint the judges. On the other hand, we frequently observe the phenomenon that the candidates refused to accept the appointment, be it that they felt unqualified, be it that they feared to be involved into mundane affairs. This reserve also can be ascertained in fourteenth century Syria where 16 persons, that is about 7%, refused to become judges after the appointment. The political rulers had the right of appointment, but they generally were not allowed to force the candidates to accept the appointment.

3. In the same way as the political rulers were entitled to appoint the judges, the qādīs in their turn had the right to appoint the deputies. In other terms, at least 25% of the qādīs listed in this study have not been appointed by the sultans and governors but by the judges and chief judges. As mentioned above, we have to consider that the number of 67 most probably doesn't reflect the real number of deputies, because every judge normally had 2, sometimes even 3 deputies. This would mean that there were 340-510 deputies instead of 67 deputies mentioned explicitly in the sources.

4. In 4 cases the Shāfi‘ī chief judges in Damascus extended their competence by appointing not only deputies but also independent judges. So ‘Alā’ ad-Dīn al-Qunawī appointed Abū Bakr b. ash-Sharīshī in Ḥimṣ.<sup>44</sup> Somewhat earlier Muḥammad b. ‘Abdalhaqq b. ‘Isā was appointed by Taqī d-Dīn as-Subkī in the same town.<sup>45</sup> His son, Tāj ad-Dīn as-Subkī, chose his relative Quṭb ad-Dīn as-Subkī to become judge in Ba‘labakk.<sup>46</sup> In Ḥusbān it was Badr ad-Dīn al-Hakkārī who was appointed by al-Balqīnī.<sup>47</sup>

5. More than half of the qāḍis were related with at least one another qāḍī in Syria. No doubt nepotism played an important role in selecting the candidates. It becomes clear that qaḍā’ tended to be the preserve of influential families each dominating or co-dominating a certain region in Syria. So in Damascus it was the scholarly dynasty of the Subkīs followed by the Akhnā’īs, Qazwīnīs, Sharīshīs and Banu Jamā‘a who mostly assumed the office of qaḍā’ for the Shāfi‘ī madhab. Some Ḥanafī qāḍis in Damascus belonged to the Kufrī family whereas the Maqdisīs, Murdāwīs, Banū Ḥamza and Banū Munajjā dominated the Ḥanbalī jurisdiction. In Aleppo it was the Banū Hirmās for the Shāfi‘īs and the Banū ‘Adīm for the Ḥanafīs who controlled qaḍā’ for their madhab respectively. In a third town, Ḥamāt, the Bārizīs possessed the monopoly of qaḍā’ for the Shāfi‘īs.

Out of all law schools represented in Syria, only the Mālikīs didn’t succeed in establishing a powerful qāḍī family and this certainly accounts for the weak position of that madhab in the judicial administration.

6. Another important factor of appointment, closely connected with nepotism, was succession. In 28 cases, jurists became independent judges after being deputies and very often these deputies were related with the retiring predecessor. By appointing the deputies judges in many cases anticipated the appointment of their successors.

7. In a few cases it is the excellent qualification or reputation of a scholar which caused the political ruler to appoint him.

Altogether we have 106 cases, in which members of the fuqahā' class—and not the political rulers—appointed the judges or prepared the ground for an appointment. On the other hand, there are only three qādīs being compelled to assume the office and 9 qādīs who were appointed after a new ruler had seized power.

In principle the same applies to dismissals. We have 229 cases in which qādīs left the office for one reason or another but only in 11 cases the dismissals have been pronounced on political grounds. So, for example, in 709/1309, 759/1358 and 792/1390 some qādīs have been removed from office because of the change of power. On the other hand, in 156 cases the tenure of qaḍā' ended because of death, voluntary resignation or promotion. Ten judges have been dismissed because of injustice and many other qādīs have been involved in the procedure of dismissal. With regard to the remaining 52 cases we don't have any information about the reasons of dismissal, but the afore mentioned figures may be taken as representative for the low extent of political interference.

Apart from appointments and dismissals there is another aspect of qaḍā' concerning the qādī's economic dependence. Usually the judges were paid regular salaries and this also applies to the qādīs of fourteenth century Syria,<sup>48</sup> even though in one case the sultan refused to pay the salaries.<sup>49</sup> With regard to the considerable amount of the salaries one should suppose that bribery was a common means to obtain a profitable qādī post. Nevertheless, the sources remain silent about such a practice, although this certainly doesn't reflect the whole truth. What we definitely know is that some judges waived the salary and exercised qaḍā' gratuitously.<sup>50</sup> Other qādīs remained economically independent in so far as they exercised a lucrative profession in addition to qaḍā'.<sup>51</sup>

The jurisdictional activities of Muslim scholars extended to a variety of legal fields as appears from fatāwā collections<sup>52</sup> and other documents.<sup>53</sup> This most probably applies to the qādīs as well. It is clear that the prosopographical literature hardly provides material about the substance of judicial pronouncements. Nevertheless, there can be observed a tendency as to which areas of the law are concerned and, particularly, which fields of the law attracted the attention of the political rulers. Whereas the large majority of the cases concerning deviation from the madhab opinion,<sup>54</sup> apostasy,<sup>55</sup> endowment<sup>56</sup> and other fields of the law<sup>57</sup> is ruled by the qādīs independently, only in some few cases the political rulers were involved. These being extraordinary cases of particular public interest makes one believe that the bulk of judicial decisions dealing with day-to-day issues was free from any political influence.

V. CONCLUSION

The main purpose of this study was to demonstrate that there existed an efficient judicial system in fourteenth century Syria entirely determined by Islamic law. On the basis of numerous biographical sources and chronicles it has been proved that the essential preconditions of qaḍā', that is number, qualification and independence of the judges, have been fulfilled to a considerable extent in that time and region. Although this is only a short study requiring further, more detailed examination, we may propose that there was a clear tendency towards the application of Islamic law in a judicial frame. Altogether 236 judges, chief judges and deputies dispersed all over Syria have been detected in the sources. Most of them represented the Shāfi‘ī madhab followed by the Ḥanafīs, Ḥanbalīs and Mālikīs. Almost all of them were trained in Islamic law in at least one of the numerous law colleges in Syria and many of them memorized or were familiar with the most important furu‘ and uṣūl works current at that time. The fact that many qādīs in the same time assumed teaching posts in a law college suggests a close connection between theory and practice. The appointment of the judges, in theory a prerogative of the political rulers, in fact was in the purview of the qādīs themselves. Whereas in 106 cases the appointment was influenced by the qādīs in one way or another, only in 12 cases arbitrary decisions of the political rulers are noticeable. Other restrictions

ABSTRACT

The relationship between theory and practice in Islamic law can be examined in several ways. With regard to the substance of Islamic law one could ask in which way are or can the rulings of the shari'a be applied. Another question concerning the external aspects of the shari'a could be, to what extent do the political situation, the judicial administration, the education system and other socio-political factors allow a shari'a conforming jurisdiction. Qādīs who are not qualified, whose competence is reduced by the political rulers or whose judgements are influenced by political interests, are not able to exercise qādā' in the frame of the shari'a.

The examination at hand therefore aims to reconstruct the socio-political background of a number of qādīs in eighth/fourteenth century Syria. On the basis of several biographical works containing detailed and authentic descriptions of more than 200 Syrian qādīs it shall be demonstrated that there existed the essential preconditions for exercising qādā' in that time and region. As a result of this study, which possibly throws light on a new aspect of qādā' in the Mamluk Empire, one may propose that the qādīs, along with other 'ulamā', form a separate body within the Mamluk state system which on one side appears to be strong enough to resist political encroachments and, on the other, provides for and profits from a high level of legal education.

RESUMEN

La relación entre la teoría y la práctica en el derecho islámico puede ser examinada desde distintos puntos de vista. Por lo que se refiere a la sustancia del derecho islámico, se puede plantear la pregunta de cómo las normas de la šari'a son o pueden ser aplicadas. Otra pregunta relativa a los aspectos externos de la šari'a es hasta qué punto la situación política, la administración judicial, el sistema educativo y otros factores socio-políticos permiten la existencia de una jurisdicción conforme a la šari'a. Los cadiés que no tienen las cualificaciones necesarias, cuya competencia se ve limitada por los gobernantes o cuyos juicios se ven influidos por los intereses políticos, no pueden ejercer el cadiazgo en el contexto de la šari'a.

El análisis llevado a cabo en este artículo tiene como objetivo reconstruir el contexto socio-político de los cadiés en Siria durante los siglos VIII/XIV. A partir de los datos de varios diccionarios biográficos que contienen descripciones auténticas y detalladas de más de doscientos cadiés sirios, se demuestra que existían las pre-condiciones esenciales para ejercer el cadiazgo en aquella época y región. Se argumenta que los cadiés, junto con otros ulemas, formaban un cuerpo específico dentro del sistema estatal mame-luco que, por una parte, era lo suficientemente fuerte como para resistir intervenciones políticas y, por otro lado, suministraba un alto nivel de formación legal y se beneficiaba al tiempo de él.
